FLOW - Happy Architecture
The key aspect to flow (aka the happy moment) is a combination of "control" and "preparation." Can we design our built environment that reflects an emotional state of flow and happiness? As human beings, we are spatially sensitive and emotionally attached to our surroundings in all aspects: from physical and social to psychological.

PERSONAL STATEMENT

" In the field of architecture, I practice on innovation and conceptual design as a fourth-year design student at Chulalongkorn University's INDA. While having a strong interest in design across disciplines, as well as exploring visual-spatial analytics and human-environment interaction into architectural intervention based on user experience, observation, and understanding to provide qualitative and quantitative research on everyday life in architecture. "

" I'm excited to be a part of the company, and I'd like to contribute new creations for future generations that use critical ability to understand a variety of things, including not only the composition of images, materials, and spaces, but also the use of emotion and memory to navigate the future.
